

RIVER AFLAME NEAR FLEET.

Patrick McCabe was pushing a small boat into the back of the Twenty-fourth Street basin at the foot of West Street last night when a fire started from a camp on board. McCabe pulled a fire-gallon can of the burning gasoline overboard and put out the fire on his boat.

Two other boats were nearby. The burning gasoline spread along the shore and was extinguished by the fire boat.

John Debele and William O'Connell, both sailors, came in a launch and pulled a dozen of the boats into mid-stream. Two fire engines arrived but they could do nothing. Fire sailors put out from shore in boats and with hand pumps the burning gasoline.

BROTHER'S BLOOD FAILS TO SAVE FLEISCHMANN, MILLIONAIRE'S SON

Funeral arrangements will be announced today for Otto I. Fleischmann, son of the millionaire banker who founded the Broadway branch of the Transatlantic of a part of blood from his brother's arteries failed to save him after he shot himself Wednesday in the Holland House.

About Fleischmann, twenty-nine years old, who early yesterday lay on the operating table in Bellevue while surgeons drew his blood to strengthen him for an operation, was at the bedside yesterday afternoon when Otto died. Charles Fleischmann, another brother, and a sister also were in the room.

Dr. John Douglas and other surgeons did their utmost to save Otto's life, but he failed to rally. The bullet, which had lodged in the thoracic region, touching the heart, could not be removed without a dangerous operation. Fleischmann was conscious to the greater part of the night. He revived once or twice sufficiently to recognize those about him and to express a desire to live.

Dr. Douglas announced shortly after noon that Otto could not possibly live, and a further sacrifice by Raoul would be utterly useless. Otto remained in a stupor until his death. Otto Fleischmann, who had been President of the Fleischmann Vehicle Company of No. 415 East Eighty-third Street, retired from business more than five years ago because of a nervous complaint.

Little Touches Achieve the Smartness
In the Accessories to Misses' Costumes

This Is Especially Noticeable in Chic Designs of Trimness and Is as Important as Main Design or Silhouette of the Costume—What May Be Done With This Year's High Collars.

The small accessories of smart dress are quite as important to the effect of trimness and chic as the main design of silhouette of the costume. In fact many times it is the little touches which achieve smartness, and to a costume not out of work yet out-dated, the mere addition of a modish sleeve or collar will rejuvenate it.

This season collars have made desperate efforts to hug the neck snugly, but many women revolt at their so-called affection, and cling to the comfortable low collar.

So it is for those who do, and those who don't, like the high collar that I have designed this convertible one, shown above in its three modifications. Each model is delightfully different from the other, so that with one blouse one may have the benefit of several with such a trick collar.

The centre model of stripe material shows it open wide, ideal for sport wear, while the lower one shows it fastened into a stock suitable for the trim tailored suit. The upper model is a halfway concession to the low and the high, and is suitable of dainty sheer batiste or organdy, finished with fine lace.

The miniature pattern of this collar proves that it is no more intricate than an ordinary collar and makes no extra demands on time, labor or material.

NO CHANCE FOR SPIES
TO GET BUSY IN LONDON,
NAVY OFFICER FINDS

American Under Suspicion for Adjusting His Blind and Swinging His Arms.

The utmost precautions the British are taking to keep London dark at night, so that German airplanes may not find the city an illuminated target, is well exemplified in a little anecdote related by Lieut. Furling, the radio officer on Admiral Fletcher's staff.

"It was Lieut. Stanford C. Hooper, my predecessor as radio officer on the staff, who had the adventure in dark London," said Lieut. Furling.

"He was stopping in one of the quiet London hotels a short time ago. It was at a time when there were Zeppelins and rumors of Zeppelins flying everywhere, and London at night was as dark as the inside of your pocket."

"Hooper's sitting room was fitted with a sort of Venetian blind, and one night, when he wanted to read, he got up and adjusted the blind. As they did not work readily it took some jiggling to get them fixed, and of course the operation was actually a repeated opening and closing of the blind."

"Very little while after he got them fixed there was a knock at his door and he found a policeman on the threshold, who in a few unequivocal sentences suggested that Hooper had been sending secret flashes by means of the blind. Of course his explanations were quite convincing and there the incident closed, but it showed how careful were the precautions the English people were taking."

"Hooper had another adventure too, and it was very like the one with the blind. It gave him a further insight into British caution. The authorities were on tip-toe. I'll tell you. It happened one day Hooper went to the seashore to Brighton. I think it was. The day was a very cold one and Hooper found that walking on the beach was a chilly pastime. No he did what every one does—he began swinging his arms wide and then slapping them around his body to get his blood going. It is one of the oldest warming devices known."

"But Hooper didn't get very far with the exercise. A watchman ran up to him and made him stop because he looked as if he were signaling to some one. Again he explained and again he got out of trouble. But the British authorities were very much in earnest. They were not taking any chances."

George Boyce, arrested by Police Officer Guller at Atlantic Avenue after a two-block chase from Columbia Street early today, solemnly assured the police that when he caught a watchman from the pocket of Capt. August Hansen of the large Ritzler on a Broadway car he had committed the first crime of his life. At Headquarters today he was recognized by Detective John McQuinn and then confessed he had spent seven terms in prison aggregating twenty years for burglary and theft. He was held for the Grand Jury by Magistrate Gale near in Butler Street Court today.
